Comprehensive care for young children is essential in ensuring their well-being.

- The establishment of the Hunter Street Centre and nursery services has been a priority.
- The Centre also offers specialist clinics, including a baby health clinic.

State government funding has been crucial in supporting these services.

In 1972:
- State School Nursery at Prince's Hill opened.
- Nursery school places were limited to 150, with 250 places available by 1975.

State government contributed £25,000 per annum to the Centre.

In 1973:
- The Centre received an additional £50,000 from the state government.
- Federal government contributed £40,000.

By 1975:
- The Centre had expanded to accommodate 250 children.
- Additional services included a dental clinic and a baby health centre.

In 1976:
- The Centre continued to expand, with plans for further development.

This centre was one of the first to receive one-parent families. It was designed to especially cater to children of parents who had recently lost a partner.

Sister services were introduced in 1976 by a number of innovative programs and Council decisions. The first of these was a Centre which offered day care for children of working mothers. Support for this program led to the establishment of a similar Centre at the Queen Elizabeth II Health Centre.

SERVICE
The future looks bright. Will the Melbourne City Council really begin the promised position among other municipalities that it had in the 1960s to 1970s?

Co-ordinating it to the neighbourhood level of activity, without the association from those neighbourhoods, the association from each of the committees and reluctance of the members of the association, numbers of the co-ordinating meeting to the goals and objectives of the association and working in the municipality, the call is made up of people living and transferring its responsibilities to the new association mandated, the central children's committee winds up investigation the principles, of the report's policy record, (M.A.C.'s) which has as a major goal the implementation of community-based children and youth services. Public meeting to launch the new "Melbourne Neighbourhood".
